

Asteroids! - and the end of the world as we know it!

If we go outside a clear dark night, we may see many bright stars, but if we are lucky, there suddenly darts across the sky a thin bolt of wonderful light. Meteors, or shooting stars as they are wrongly named, are rocks from space that have fallen upon the Earth. Once considered omens of misfortune, they are now recognised to hold the secrets of the Solar System within them. In swarms they orbit the Sun, the debris of passing comets and asteroids, until they encounter the Earth and fall to ground. Sometimes, very large objects called asteroids enter, punching huge craters in the ground, and destroying everything for miles in all directions. In this book, we take a closer look at these objects and their origins; what we can learn about the Solar System from them; why they can suddenly change course and head right for us, and how we could stop an asteroid heading right for us. Written in a jargon-free style, with many photographs, maps and diagrams, this is ideal for high-school or undergraduate students, or just those with a passing interest in the rubble that we share our neighbourhood with.
