

Towards Sustainable Land Use: Furthering Cooperation Between People and Institutions - Selected papers of the 9th Conference of the International Soil Conservation Organisation (ISCO)

A number of distributions to this publication contain a wide variety of successful, practical and often innovative solutions for sustainable land-use. Examples include improvements to soil quality in sites where the soil has already been degraded as well as precautions for soil protection. They should strengthen the international community in its commitment to further support programmes to improve land quality. National and sub-national governments should support financial and economic baseline studies on the implications of continued degradation, and use the results to design appropriate policy responses in, for example, support to extension, research marketing facilities and related programmes in healthcare, education, etc. Transboundary eco-regional land conservation and basin-wide watershed development can be facilitated under the auspices of international conventions, action programmes or regional frameworks. Prevention should be the leading principle in soil conservation policy, since rehabilitation is extremely difficult and often not possible at all, once symptoms of soil degradation are detected.
