

Christ and the cowboy

Communication with words has always been a part of Kenneth Wyatt's life. He began preaching in churches while in high school, had his own traveling magic show with his nimble hands and glib tongue in his mid-teens, called cadences in Uncle Sams Navy in the 1940s, led cheers along the side lines in college days, and he has spoken as an after-dinner entertainer and motivational lecturer for literally thousands of occasions. Many believe his greatest contribution to the world of words is his outstanding ability to rhyme. With a mixture of story-telling, preaching, wit, childhood, salvation, humor and memories, his poetry touches us where we live and where we have lived. His poems are quoted and read by teachers, students, cowboys and clergy across the nation. Poetry is more than just something to do for Kenneth. Often it is a compulsion, a necessity. In his words, It sometimes just springs upon me, a need to say lines that have a lilt - a rhythm, to end lines in words that rhyme. Of course, as anything that is compulsive, it sometimes can place a person in peril. One time, in a college history class, Kenneth, taking notes on the professor's lectures for a week, actually put it all down in poetic form. The professor learned of the feat, had copies made, and required the class to memorize the poem. This in no way added to his popularity among the students of the class! However, many admit that, after all these years, they still remember certain points of those lectures that otherwise would have been forgotten. Poetry, says Wyatt, is sometimes the best method to say something, in a non-offensive way, that needs to be remembered, emphasized, understood or emotionalized. I guess what I mean is - everybody should write a love poem.
